Fast Food Meets The Web

Following the success of the first Internet-enabled Burger King fast food restaurant in New York's Wall Street, patrons of the Burger King outlet in Times Square will this week be able to send electronic postcards over the Internet while munching on their hamburgers. With the purchase of any value meal, New Yorkers and tourists alike will be given a ticket with a PIN number that provides them with twenty minutes of free Internet access. Diners can also use the restaurant's computer terminals to chat online or hold live video conferences with other customers – located either in the Times Square outlet or the Wall Street branch.

Unemployment

In winter 1997-98, there were 1,861,000 unemployed people in the United Kingdom, representing 6.4 per cent of the total economically active population. Unemployment has fallen sharply since the end of 1992.

Long-term unemployment (defined as twelve months or more) is especially serious, because the longer someone is unemployed the less able they are to compete for jobs. In winter 1997-98, there were about 583,000 long-term unemployed. This is below the European Union average and compares with about 853,000 long-term unemployed in winter 1996-97.

Unemployment is not uniform across the regions of the U.K. Merseyside (the city of Liverpool and the surrounding area), the North East, Northern Ireland and London are the areas of highest unemployment. The first three of these regions were strongly associated in the 1970s with traditional industries – shipbuilding, textiles and mining. The high unemployment rates in these regions are likely to be associated with the sharp decline in these industries. The high unemployment in the capital reflects the fact that people who are out of work are often concentrated in cities.
